The Portsmouth Conference videos provide insight into current climate policies and the future

Held on October 18 and 19 in New Castle, NH--The Portsmouth Conference brought together internationally known thinkers to discuss--as well as how to improve--current climate policies, the results of which have been captured in recently released videos available at theportsmouthconference.org.

While the media often covers the subject of climate change, less attention is spent on the policies that seek to address it. Such policies often yield unintended consequences, which served as the basis behind the conference, hosted by nonprofit Citizens Count.

Attended by more than 200 people, the conference was created as a forum for leading thinkers to meaningfully discuss climate policies, their consequences and possible solutions. Videos provide insight into the discussions, which represented the first time speakers with such varying views on climate policies that had ever been brought together into one venue.

Kevin Fay, Esq., negotiator of the Montreal Accords, moderated the discussions.
